WRITING

Plans to create a food quarter in the street have been given the go-ahead despite objections by people living there. At a recent town council meeting it has been decided. The first idea of a redesign came almost a year ago and at a time townpeople didn't like it at all. Late-night food quarter will take some time to build and develop, so people still have hope that town council will change their mind, as they create and sign petitions.

While many are disappointed in this decision, others try to find the bright side. Maybe there would be new kinds of foods to try, for example cultural? Or there would be more places to go, hang-out or even celebrate. Especially good news about quarter mean a lot to businessmen. New opportunity to open a place and earn some money, or even become much wide-known and someday become a big company.

But for the others situation may seem worse. Not everyone is happy with change. Some tend to hold onto past things – the look of the street without food quarters. Someone just needs peace and quiet but it would be impossible to even sleep if the food quarter would be open all night.

So it seems like opinions are different. I imagine that in the future people would get over it. Quiter ones should change their place of living, others may wanna be a bit less loud on the streets.
